ELEMENTS OF SEA LORE: THE NAUTICAL MILE

A nautical mile, sea mile or nautimile is a unit of length. It is accepted for use with the International System of Units (SI), but it is not an SI unit. The nautical mile is used around the world for maritime and aviation purposes. It is commonly used in international law and treaties, especially regarding the limits of territorial waters. It developed from the geographical mile.

The international standard definition is:

1 nautical mile = 1852 metres exactly.

The nautical mile was historically defined as a minute of arc along a meridian of the Earth. It can therefore be used for approximate measures on a meridian as change of latitude on a nautical chart.

According to WGS84, radius of curvature in a meridian plane is 6 356 752.3 metres at the poles and 6 378 137 metres at the Equator. By the definition of geodetic latitude, length of the minute of arc depends on the radius of curvature; distance to the angle (1 minute, in this case), not to the Earth's centre. This length equals to approx. 1849.12 metres at the poles and 1855.34 metres at the Equator.

Length of a minute of arc defined by the geocentric latitude depends on the distance from the Earth's centre (and curvature). This length is greater at the Equator.

Other nations had different definitions of the nautical mile. International agreement was achieved in 1929, when the International Extraordinary Hydrographic Conference held in Monaco adopted a definition of one (1) international nautical mile as being equal to 1,852 metres exactly.

This value is very close (within 0.01 percent) to the average length of one minute of latitude (1852.235 m), i.e. the sea-level surface distance between the Earth's poles is marginally over $180 \times 60 = 10800$ nautical miles.

Since the 1929 agreement, all nations have now adopted the international definition. As a simpler approximation, designers of radar systems for ballistic and cruise missiles for use by the United States Navy in the 1950s would take 6000 feet as their equivalent of a nautical mile. Ship-borne computer systems developed for the Royal Navy also used the "data mile" of 6000 feet, and the more unusual "foot", equivalent to about 9 inches, defined as 6000/8192 feet.
